Panel Wants Students with Bad Grades Stripped of Financial Aid

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CP) - The government will soon force college students to strip their transcripts of bad grades and financial aid, at least if a congressional recommendation is followed through.

The National Commission on Student Financial Assistance, created three years ago to draw up student aid bills for Congress, last week recommended a series of new academic rules that colleges would have to impose on aid recipients.

"They must be, in fact, "satisfactory academic progress," toward their degrees because of bad grades," the report states.

"Colleges, the commission said, often don't take aid away from students who don't make "satisfactory academic progress" toward their degrees because of bad grades."

"Our record seems to point out that the standards are not monitored very closely," says commission spokeswoman Susan Turner.

"The proposed new rules are "an attempt to get schools to make it clear to students what the standards are," adds Tom Wolanin, an aide to commission member Rep. William Ford (D-MI).

In January, 1982, the Government Accounting Office (GAO) estimated that as many as 35 percent of the nation's college aid offices may not monitor aid recipients' grades of all.

Among the 5800 transcripts the GAO surveyed in 1982, it found some colleges had grade point averages as low as .11 and as high as .35.

To assure that grade standards are observed, the commission wants Congress to require schools to publish minimum attendance and grade requirements for federal financial aid.

Colleges would also have to identify students for one-time, full-time, or part-time aid and provide them to Congress with grade point averages as low as .11 and as high as .35.

"This does not mean that aid recipients' grades at all. Colleges would have to impose on aid recipients' grades at all. Researchers want Congress to "put more flesh on those bones" of the new rules over the next few years.
